Title of project: A Qualitative Study to Explore How People with Early Stage Dementia Respond to Offers of Psychosocial Interventions

Abstract

Aim: Explore how people with early stage dementia respond to offers of psychosocial interventions.

Background:

This study explores the kind of support people with early stage dementia living in the community may want, and what influences readiness to engage in psychosocial interventions. Understanding this can allow benefits of interventions offered by occupational therapists to be realised, contributing to the evidence base required by occupational therapists and others in the field of psychosocial intervention dementia research and practice.

Methods:
Face-to-face semi-structured interviews with people with early stage dementia, their family carers, and staff. People with dementia are supported to express their views.
